Dersin Amacı	Course Overview: In this course include understanding and learning key chapter points, relevant concepts, theories and research done on the chapter topic presented in the course. As human beings we interact with others in many different situations and our lives evolve in a social context (i.e., subject to change). As a field, social psychology studies how the influence of other people shapes an individual's thoughts, emotions and behaviors. In this course, we examine traditional issues such as aggression, research methods, attitudes, group processes, altruism, and social influence and relevant more recent topics are also covered. Students will be introduced to topics of social psychology and gain a critical approach of how social psychology related phenomenon influence your daily lives. Learning Objective: Describe how social psychologists and sociologists view to social events. Understand how scientific and nonscientific approaches social influence. In this introductory social psychology course students will be introduced to the field, learn about how social psychologists do research, understand the dynamics of social world, other people and ourselves in a social context, and the ingredients of the costs and benefits of dissonance reduction.
